

Reflecting on my academic and professional path, I see how each step has contributed to my pursuit of studying law. Beginning at Hankuk University of Foreign Studies, where I received a Bachelor's degree in Business Administration and English Linguistics, and now working as a Climate and ESG Research Analyst at MSCI, my path has been a journey through various academic fields. After going through these experiences, I have gained a deep understanding of the crucial contribution legal experts make in carrying out significant changes, especially in corporate governance, sustainability, and regulatory frameworks.

My academic achievements were marked by distinction, as I graduated at the top of my class during my undergraduate studies. This academic excellence continued as a Fulbright Scholar at Columbia University's Quantitative Methods in Social Sciences (QMSS) program, where I refined my research methodologies. My doctoral studies in finance at the University of Rochester further deepened my understanding of the intricacies involved in corporate governance and sustainability research.

Transitioning from academia to the corporate world, specifically joining MSCI's research department, provided me with a unique insight into how legal structures influence business valuations and investments. My role enabled me to make significant contributions to helping companies embrace sustainable management practices.

Engrossed in my professional pursuits, I found interpreting global legal regulations and frameworks like the ones set forth by the Sustainability Accounting Standards Board, Climate Disclosure Standards Board, and Global Reporting Initiative to be quite captivating. These standards play a crucial role in pinpointing risks and opportunities that have a significant financial impact on companies and the global economy. An enhanced understanding of the interaction between case law and these frameworks, along with the practical application of legal principles, has always been critical to refining the counsel I provide to clients.

Now, after more than three years of experience in the corporate sector, I am at a crucial point in my career. Despite excelling as an analyst, my ultimate goal is to have a direct impact on shaping and implementing laws related to corporate practices. Recognizing the significant influence of legal professionals on my daily work has strengthened my determination to attend law school. I firmly believe that pursuing a legal education will equip me with the skills needed to thoroughly comprehend, analyze, and impact the legal structures governing corporate regulations. I am highly drawn to the idea of becoming part of a community that promotes positive change through legal knowledge.

Upon admission to law school, I will focus primarily on international, labor, corporate, and environmental law, with a specific emphasis on corporate regulation. This focus resonates well with my academic background and professional experiences, providing a distinctive mix of legal and financial insights. I plan to work with business school professors to delve deeper into corporate sustainability, acknowledging the crucial link between legal expertise and sustainable business strategies.

My desire to pursue law school stems from the conviction that legal knowledge can revolutionize corporate sustainability efforts. It excites me to delve into legal studies and contribute to the promotion of responsible and sustainable business practices. Envisioning a future as an international lawyer, I intend to provide counsel to companies, governments, and NGOs on navigating complex regulations, ensuring compliance, and upholding corporate ethics. I expect to become responsible for providing guidance on legal frameworks to ensure compliance with laws, as well as playing a key role in promoting transparency, accountability, and sustainable development in the corporate sector. This dedication extends beyond mere professionalism, demonstrating a strong commitment to integrating law with sustainability to advance an economy that values both environmental protection and social welfare. I am committed to leveraging legal knowledge to drive positive transformation towards a sustainable global economy, rooted in a strong dedication to ESG and sustainability principles.
